University Press of Mississippi. Paperback. Book Condition: New. Paperback. 450 pages. Dimensions: 9.0in. x 6.0in. x 1.0in. This is a remarkable collection of letters covering nearly four decades of correspondence between two of the Souths foremost literary figures. The series began in 1927 when Tate invited Lytle, who was then a student at the Yale School of Drama, to visit him at his apartment at 27 Bank Street in New York. Although they were acquaintances through their involvement with the Fugitives at Vanderbilt, they had never been close friends because Lytles association with the group occurred after Tate had left Nashville. But after Lytles visit with Tate and his wife, Caroline Gordon, both the friendship and the correspondence grew. The letters in the long sequence of exchanges took on a different content and character during each of the decades. The early letters, those exchanged between 1927-1939, show the development of Tate and Lytles relationship because of what they had in common--love for the South. These letters discuss plans for writing their southern biographies the two Agrarian symposia--Ill Take My Stand (1930), and Who Owns America (1936), as well as Lytles first novel, The Long Night (1936) and Tates work on his novel, The Fathers. Although the letters of the forties deal with such basic questions as where each man should live and how he should support himself while he writes, their primary focus is first with Lytles and then with Tates editorship of The Sewanee Review. The letters of the fifties are by far the most valuable for literary commentary. In these Lytle reads and critiques many of Tates essays and poems, and Tate, in turn, reads and responds to Lytles plans for the novel he was to be so long in writing, The Velvet Horn. Although many letters in the...
