This gravel remains on the beach, and is accumulated there: none of it is to be found either in the dunes, or on the surface of the meadows, though they are covered with sand to a considerable distance from the sea; because the winds carry away nothing but this sand, which is very fine. The wind was at that time strong, and the weather dry; and I saw the sand whirling in clouds along the whole length of that extensive coast. This is a great inconvenience with respect to the channel, which at present forms the only communication between the gulph and the sea: because the westerly winds, when long continued, raise the sand from the whole coast in that direction, and clouds of it flying across the channel, a grfl quantity falls into the water, and this it is necessary to clear away, else...
