From this unit cost and the smallest storage development considered, 11000 mil. gal., it is evident that the minimum additional surface reservoir capacity would cost in the neighborhood of $20 000 000. Even if the expense of open surface reservoirs of this type were not prohibitive they should be avoided, because of the large evaporation losses from their surface, the high temperature of the water stored in them in midsummer, the danger of pollution and the growths of organisms with the resulting tastes and odors that would occur. Fortunately, there is no necessity for embarking on such a project of developing surface storage, because there exists beneath the entire Edgewood watershed a vast volume of natural storage in the pore spaces of the water-bearing strata that may be made available at a fraction of the cost of the surface storage. Indeed, the entire Edgewood watershed may be considered to be underlain by a great subterranean reservoir, the surface of which is the water-table, already described as sloping seaward from the ground water divide, and the bottom, the underlying bed rock many hundred feet below. The conditions for preserving the quality of the water in this underground reservoir are ideal, as the stored waters are thoroughly protected from pollution, from changes in temperature and from organic growths. There are, furthermore, no evaporation losses, which on surface reservoirs in this vicinity are nearly equivalent to the depth of rain which falls on them. Unlike a surface...
